The Honorable Jim McCrery
Ranking Member
Committee on Ways & Means
U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, DC 20501

Dear Congressman McCrery:

As you examine the U.S.-China economic relationship and consider the merits and shortcomings of a number of very different legislative proposals to address bilateral trade concerns, we urge you to assess carefully how best to meet the many challenges the relationship poses, while also ensuring that its many benefits for America and Americans are not unintentionally damaged. Acting prudently is particularly important at a time of slowing growth at home and growing instability in world financial markets.

The United States – its workers, farmers, manufacturers, service providers and the economy as a whole – has enjoyed substantial economic benefits in the seven years since Congress granted China permanent normal trading relations and China joined the World Trade Organization. China has become one of the largest customers for U.S. goods, services and agricultural products. It has cut its tariffs in half and become America's fastest growing (and soon-to-be third largest) export market, and it has become the third largest importer in the world. Our economies are deeply intertwined.

At the same time, we recognize the major trade challenges the United States faces with China both in our own market as well as in accessing fully and competing on a level playing field in China. Our organizations believe that to address these challenges, the United States must use all appropriate mechanisms, including aggressive diplomacy, enforcing the rules of trade, and international dispute settlement when appropriate, in order to ensure increased market access and fair treatment of U.S. companies and workers. Our organizations believe these challenges should also be addressed domestically, to ensure that all Americans benefit more from U.S. engagement in the global economy.

We are very concerned, however, that a number of pending legislative proposals, if enacted, would represent an abuse or violation of international rules and also run counter to our economic interests. One example is the proposed imposition of countervailing or antidumping duties based on a unilateral currency policy analysis. Such measures would erode the very rules that support U.S. commercial success at home and abroad, including in China. Indeed, such measures are more likely to prompt China to restrict, rather than open, its own market, as well as take other countermeasures that would undermine U.S. competitiveness and our economic interests.

In fact, the yuan has appreciated by more than 15 percent since 2005, and global and domestic economic factors in China today are increasingly aligned for further and more rapid appreciation of the yuan, one of Congress' primary concerns. We are deeply concerned that legislative proposals under consideration would provide a disincentive for China to allow further appreciation of the yuan, at precisely the time when the pace has increased.

America will continue to prosper in the global economy if we are strategic about the policies and objectives pursued. At a time when Congress is working to shore up U.S. economic growth, we urge you not to take action that could diminish U.S. competitiveness, particularly with respect to a market as important to the United States' continued growth as China.

Sincerely,

3M
