

2015 Chinese Government Agency Work Priorities and Plans

March 2015¹

Each year, Chinese government agencies – including ministries, commissions, and offices – announce priorities and goals for their work for the coming 12 months. Such reports provide important information for companies as they conduct strategic business and government affairs planning in China. More broadly, these priorities provide guidance about how policymakers seek to implement high-level government plans, such as the October 2014 Fourth Plenum of the Chinese Communist Party Congress and the December 2014 Central Economic Work Conference. Common themes that appear across agencies' 2015 priorities reflect goals in many of these plans, such as promoting reform and opening, streamlining administrative processes, improving the legal system, increasing supervision and discipline for agency staff, and adjusting to the "new normal" of a slower-growth Chinese economy.

The list below is divided into ministries, commissions (generally those with ministry-level status), and other key organizations, in the same fashion as the US-China Business Council's (USCBC) government structure report. This information is based on regular searches of government and news sources. However, not every agency plan that might be a priority for members had been released as of the date this report was drafted. For example, this list does not include 2015 priorities for the State Council Legislative Affairs Office, the Standardization Administration of China, or Xinhua News Agency.

Agency priorities come in a variety of forms, including statements and reports delivered by agency leadership at annual work conferences, written reports posted to agency websites, and news stories from official Chinese media. For each agency listed below, this report includes information about how and when priorities were announced, a brief summary of the main targets for 2015, and a link to the original source.

¹ Data is up-to-date as of March 2, 2015.
